

Please recycle to a friend!

ORIGAMIPOEMS.COM

~

origamipoems@gmail.com

Cover art: Pip Hartnett

Origami Poem Project™

Mutability

Carol Anderson © 2015

Carol Anderson

A Mélange of One's Own

My garden is a mélange
of heirloom peonies, coreopsis
running wild, and Montauk daisy slowly
building itself
to a glorious bloom
months from now.

My garden is a mélange
of stubborn daylily, majestic purple iris and pink phlox occupying the same square yard behind my Gram's cottage
by the bay.

My garden has taught me
to fashion a truce
with Mother Nature,
to accept life and garden
as is—a marvelous mélange of whatever's thrown my way.

But most of my garden
is a mélange of weeds,
a carefully cultivated
ground cover is the job of one, another
oversees uncultivated spaces

each to his/her own

typewriters type
poets compose
teachers teach
each to his/
her own

even the sun knows
its function
to blaze
heat the day
then fade away

for the moon
which knows
to glow
bright white
hanging there
in the sky
like a hot quarter
in a kid's pocket

Mayhem at the bird feeder, or, does might make right?

Four sparrows twitching seeds down their gullets--
number five alights
atop the feeder
takes a breather
then dives down
creating a flurry of feathers soon the chirps dissolve into an argument
of loud and angry accusations.
Tired of waiting
the big bright blue jay watching from aside
swoops in--
ending the discussion.

A Little Love Poem

elbow to elbow, hand to hand we accept our bodies' electric flow illuminating our universe
for the moment--
now past consummation
we doze quietly
points touching
elbow to elbow, hand to hand

Mutability

This dull repose wearies me—so restless the sea, dark within, grating at the light of half-made thoughts, like many stones rumbling under fast moving waters.
We are water, stone--air even—mixed together or falling apart. Fire too.
This brings me here to the matter at hand:
The boundaries of life are so porous that sometimes the water I am deftly smothers the fire once emblazoned by wind and I fall
apart.