

The grave digger knows
of slag and worms,
ditches dug under the green,
rot beneath red roses,
tiled granite and marble.
He lowers himself daily to excavate beside the old beds of corpses; hair, nails, gray bones in dresses
or suits, calcified in coffins.
At noon he takes lunch,
reads the paper and naps
by the newest trench, wakes on a sun-warm stone to watch the unearthly clouds.
He obscures the clay hill by the empty hole with sod, pick flowers, pack up, head home, knowing the truth lies
six feet deep without a dream.

FAREWELL STREET

Father, I am at the table knife & fork for one,
your spirit in the kitchen cries & breaks my bread.
Father, I am eating rice not wanting to be home;
my bowl is cracked & yellow,
your spoon cuts my tongue.
Father, I am frying a fish needing to eat its dream, mine got drown in the river when autumn turned me gray.
Father, I am laying our plates dull from dried-up tears;
grief seasons the meat
I swallow at every meal.

SPIRITUAL WEIGHT

I wanted to read to my dying father, cart his recumbent body and mind to my room stacked with books; cluttered chamber where I was confused by men far greater than he.
I wanted to confess the cot where I'd been ravished by Ginsberg, Miller, and Williams, plot to concoct his existential death, jacket the corpse with pages of Sartre, officialiate by reading Trutrock's Song.
But Lewis was dead, determined to die ignorant, unread.
Defeated, rejected,
I retreated behind locked doors to hide my bookish heart in a heap of brilliant leaves.

BURIED IN BOOKS

When father failed and was gone, the relatives sat in our living room dredging skillful lies to comfort his widow, daughters,
and their boyfriends,
now free to ascend the steps without his after-whisky hot harangue. The November sky, steely beyond slate windows, vanished when the fog from talk coated panes and diminished twilight.
Mother, in a frilly apron, arranged cold cuts, salads, and breads while I listened to the same-old dramas, replayed every holiday, wondering if a life could change on account of a death.

SALTED
WOUNDS

FIRST JOURNEY

To wander is best,
midnight to morning,
follow the fading footsteps left in paths; more narrow as years obscure the distance in the dimming wood. I began the trek, alone, at first, walking by musty smells and feathered calls
that teased me on to find the falls, the well, the highest tree in clouds, burrow a bed hid in the dusty bracken where the noiseless air pillows a childish mind tangled fast
in a father's grappling pain.
